A Benutiful Sight-The fine platinum chain was almost invisible, and the lustrous pendant seemed to lay unsupported on Helen's white neck.

white neck.

Excepting her engagement ring, which she had lost last spring, Helen had never had an expensive piece of lewelry, and she always longed for a lavalliere. She turned from the mirror, rejuctnantly unclasping the chain.

"Well, you're foolish. I never hesitate to ask for what I want—even if I don't get it."

"What's all this." asked Mr. Stevens, as he and Warren came in from the dining room, where they had lingered over their cigara.

"I was showing Mrs. Barclay's lavalliere."

in her pocket.

For the rest of the evening Helen could think of nothing but the pearl lavalliere. It would be wonderful with evening gowns and she could wear it in the afternoon, too. Only yesterday she had ridden down Fifth avenue with an expensively dressed woman, whose fur collar was open at the neck to show just such a pearl the neck to show just such a pearl pendant.

But would Warren be willing to put that much money in a piece of jewelry? And even if he were—should she let him? Later, when they were leaving, Mra. Stevens whispered:
"Now, don't be a little goose. Let him get it for you if he wants to."

Helen is Serry. But outside Helen took Warren's "Dear, I'm so sorry Mrs. Stevens suggested that You know I don't want anything so expensive. I know we can't afford it." arm with an anxious:

Wouldn't surprise me if the pearl was a fake. I've my doubts about that woman. Mrs. Stevens is an easy mark for anybody like that."

They were in the subway now, and Heles could not rests; taking out the case.

"Oh, this pearl must be genuine— "Oh, this pearl must be genuine—they couldn't imitate that luster"
"Put that away," growled Warren.
"This is no place to look at it,
Everybody in the car's watching you."
As Helen closed the case Warren took it from her and jut it in his pecket.
But when they reached home

But when they reached home Helen's eager excitement could not be suppressed. She flew into her dressing room and hurriedly slipped on an evening gown.

The Pearl Gone.

"Now, dear," running into the library, where Warren was reading, "let me have it. I want to see how it looks with this." Helen ran to the mantel mirror and was clasping the chain around her neck, when she fell back with a startled cry. startled cry.
"What's the matter now?" Warren

"The pearl! It's—it's gone!"
Throwing down his book, Warren strode over and, catching her roughly by the shoulder, whirled her around so the light would fall on the ornament.

The large pink pearl which had hung from the center of the pendant was missing. There was a moment's grim silence. grim silence.

A Fruitless Search.

Warren maintained the grim silence which to her was more terrifying than any violent raging. She was still groping blindly around the floor in a tremulous, futile search.

"Oh, it couldn't have fallen in the subway, I know it couldn't!" she kept repeating in a dazed way.

She was trembling with the sick dizziness that always came with any great and sudden distress. Her very kniecs were weak and shaky.

One hundred and fifty dollars, and nothing to show for it! If only she could scrimp and starve to save the money! It was the thought of Warren's having to pay for it that so terbified her.

"Yes, and we've the pleasing knowledge that we're probably paying for a fake pearl." His laugh was barsh and mirthless.

"What would you say it was worth?"

"Don't ask me. I don't know anything about pearls. But I should say," bolding it off critically, "that cost a lot of money."

Again Mrs. Stevens took the pendant from its case and clasped it around Helen's neck.

"There," turning her, flushing toward Warren. "Why don't you give it to her for a Christmas present? I already have one—that's the only reason I healtate."

The pause that followed was somewhat awkward. No man likes to be put in the position of admitting that he cannot afford or down not want to give his wife sewelry.

"Oh, no. no." protested Helen. "To be afraid I'd lose it or something might happen to it."

In spite of Warren's frowning disapproval, Helen finally yielded to Mrs. Stevens' insistence and put, the case in her packet.
